Excerpt from Dominion Medical Monthly and Ontario Medical Journal, Vol. 50: January, 1918 In the beginning of our work we gave all the organisms an equal trial, and found that the best results were to be obtained from the use of bouillon cultures, provided the culture was reasonably fresh. As a practical measure however, we soon learned that the use of cultures was out of the question, on account of the. Difficulty of always having a fresh culture on hand. In contrast to this drawback in the use of cultures. We found that the organisms compressed in tablet form with lactose were reasonably active and potent over periods of many weeks, provided the simple precaution of keeping the tablets on ice was observed. To satisfy ourselves that this was the case, we had several of the tablets from one laboratory cultivated and obtained living organisms. Without going into unnecessary detail regarding the various methods of application that we have employed in the development of our work, we shall. At. Present. Merely describe the technique we employ, and then...
